Similar conical helmet made of bronze has been found in one of the as called "warriors' graves" near Knossos dated around 1450 BC. This specimen has two large cheek guards probably stitched or riveted to the helmet and an upper pierced knot to hold a crest. Small holes all around the cheek guards and helmet lower edge were used for attachment of an internal padding more likely made of linen, felt or leather.

Very interesting conical bronze helmets 18.1 cm. high from Aegean or Balkan area dated around 14th-13th century BC. The bell-shaped helmets and knob finial formed from a single sheet of hammered bronze, the knob finial with a central perforation, reinforced on the interior with a small bronze sheet joined by three rivets, the bottom edge with perforations along the perimeter, ornamented with three incised registers below the finial and two incised registers above the bottom edge, each register composed of hatched curving lines running in opposite directions, the registers separated by hatched lines, the bottom register interrupted by four intertwined spirals. The pattern of the incised wavy lines within distinct registers clearly imitates the arrangement of the boar tusks on Achaean helmets. The spiral motif along the lower register is also common within the Achaean artistic repertoire.
